KeyMACRO is a Windows utility that allows users to use MAC (Media Access Control) addresses to access computers on the network. Typically, such MAC addresses are used for computers running under a Microsoft operating system. The program runs as a service, and enables you to use the entered MAC addresses to access networked computers as if they were located on your local network. This makes it very useful for remote users who would like to access network-attached computers without being directly connected to it. The major advantage of KeyMACRO is that the entered MAC addresses remain valid, and can be re-used, as long as the computer they were originally used to access remains on the network. The program allows you to access computers by various means, including: - Direct access to the remote computer (if it is using the same IP address) - Through the website - Through the software Psiphon - Through a web browser through a web proxy The software is very easy to use, and its instructions are easy to understand. It has a logical interface that is easy to navigate. The large fonts make it very readable even when using it on small screens. The program does not have a real user manual, but it does contain a help feature, which is displayed when the program is launched. The help feature is accessed by clicking on the question mark button in the top-right corner of the window. KeyMACRO is a very useful and efficient program that will definitely come in handy. KeyMACRO - A MUST HAVE Windows utility if you want to access any remote computer! (We don't for now.) Taken together, the results give us some interesting data points about preferences in the general population. We can take one of the most strongly-held beliefs in climate science—that the climate is warming, and that humans are responsible—and ask a few questions to see what people think about it. Three things are worth noting: First, the vast majority of the public believes that the climate is warming. Second, people tend to believe that human emissions of greenhouse gases (GHGs) are responsible for this warming, even though we're not sure of the cause. Third, and most importantly, climate change beliefs are surprisingly stable over time. If you're looking at data from 2006 to 2018, you'll see a significant drop in people's climate change beliefs, but even in the early days of 2018, more than seven in ten people said that they think that human-caused climate change is happening. That's it. That's the entire set of data points that we present in the report. This study is part of a longer-term project, "Climate change survey trends in the U.S., 2006-2018," led by Tom Wigley at the University of Oklahoma, with data analysis by Rob Koop at the University of Michigan. You can read the full report online. Check out our explainer video.
